The Nation's Interest in Conservation
 1905 and 1955
 E. Arnold Hanson and C. W. Mattison
 Forest Service
 United States Department of Agriculture

Trees grow. Fortunately so does interest in conservation.

One indicator of the steadily increasing public interest in conservation during the past 50 years is the number of agencies, organizations and educational institutions concerned with natural resources. Fifty years ago there were

- 115 foresters with degrees from American colleges.
- 7 Federal agencies with interests or influence in conservation.
- 9 State forestry departments.
- 10 forestry colleges.
- 36 State fish and game agencies (wildlife protection).
- 3 State Parks commissions.
- 7 Nationwide private conservation organizations.
- 2 Statewide private conservation organizations.

Today there are

- 22,500 foresters with degrees from American colleges.
- 40 Federal agencies with interests or influence in conservation.
- 4 Regional conservation agencies.
- 44 State forestry departments.
- 1 Territorial forestry department.
- 45 States with extension forestry programs.
- 1 Territorial extension forestry program.
- 36 Forestry colleges.
- 23 Pre-forestry and specialized schools.
- 2 Ranger schools.
- 48 State fish and game agencies (wildlife management).
- 49 Colleges and universities offering training in wildlife management.
- 46 State Parks agencies.
- 40 State water resource agencies.
- 78 Nationwide private conservation organizations.
- 20 Regional private conservation organizations.
- 236 Statewide private conservation organizations.
- 48 State agricultural experiment stations.
- 3 Territorial agricultural experiment stations.

Today's conservation organizations usually have a more specialized interest in conservation than did those of 1905. This is good for conservation. However, it does emphasize the need for each group to consider the interests and opinions of the others if conservation of our renewable natural resources is to make continued progress in the years to come.

2-The Nation's Interest in Conservation - 1905 and 1955

The attached list of agencies, organizations and educational institutions concerned with the conservation of renewable natural resources has been prepared during the 50th Anniversary year of the Forest Service, U. S. Department of Agriculture. It indicates the growth of interest in resource conservation over the past half-century. Will the next 50 years show even greater interest?
